Many remedies, which are now universally regarded, as among the most estimable in the Materia Medica, were doomed to serve in subordination, while the process of practical experiment was demonstrating their efficacy, and their claim to the character which they have obtained. Many of our indigenous plants have of late received considerable attention, and some have proved important acquisitions to the resources of the physician; others, which were no less extolled for their virtues, have scarcely survived the eulogy of their discoverers. In the present state of medical science. it is to be expected. that whatever new may be offered
