Revolted, humbled, nothing I despair d, Nor long my marvelling that thus I fared; Soon I discern d, as on a day it chanced, My vagrant eye upon a mirror glanced, My air how wayward, how unwonted wild! And tho in that clear eye my spirit smiled, The seared and shaken frame too plainly show d, What thoughts had made of it their dread abode: --The signs of fiendly visitings were seen, The scathings where a mighty scourge had been. So earth s deep scars, when wild tornadoes cease, Remain to wound the bright blue eye of peace, Warning the timid stranger from the land, That so may feel the demon s wrathful hand. No matter;--they might pity, scorn, or shun, Yet was I not of all abandon d: one Had brought me peace to mortal anguish driven, And seal d it with her love, and in her love was heaven. A new creation with her beauty came, Touching my soul with a diviner flame, That now shone out to mind s bewilder d eye, A beacon light in its perplexity. The fiend discomfited, the muse appear d, And many an hour of lonely brooding cheer d; Pacing with ardent step the silent grove, I sang of Leola, I sang of love; And it befell that these my honest lays, Stole on the notice, and achieved the praise...
