On the afternoon of Sunday, the 23rd of March, our attention was drawn towards a group of strangers on the opposite bank, evidently awaiting the arrival of a canoe to cross over to our island. They turned out to be Tuku-Yet and some of his followers; and on the Monday an occurrence of a melancholy nature took place, which greatly damped the spirits of all hands. Tuku-Yet had paid us a visit, and in his broken English was relating to us his adventures since we last saw him, before the bombardment. Suddenly our attention was drawn to our invalid sailor, over whom his Italian companion was stooping, evidently much agitated. A glance sufficed to show that the longdreaded moment had come, when death would make its first inroad amongst us. It was about mid-day when the poor fellow drew his last breath. Tuku-Yet was present, and appeared to be much concerned at what had taken place. He showed a little kindness, in despatching some of his own men for wood and linen necessary for the interment. The rajah was communicated with, as he was close at hand, in our guards hut, but...
