B-283107 The Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970 created Amtrak to provide intercity Background passenger rail service. Like all major national intercity passenger railroads in the world, Amtrak has received substantial government support, including federal capital funds. However, the Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997 (Amtrak Reform Act) prohibited Amtrak from using federal funds for operating expenses, except for an amount equal to 5 excess Railroad Retirement Tax Act payments, after 2002. To help accomplish this goal, the Amtrak Reform Act provided Amtrak with flexibility to address certain costs. It eliminated a statutory ban on contracting out work that would result in employee layoffs (except food and beverage service that could already be contracted out) and made contracting out work a part of the collective bargaining process. It also abolished labor protection arrangements that provided up to 6 years of compensation for employees who lost their jobs because of the discontinuance of intercity passenger rail service on a route or certain other actions. The Amtrak Reform Act required negotiations with the unions over the new arrangements. Amtrak also developed a series of business plans to help it achieve its financial goals. By following these plans, Amtrak has attempted to increase revenues and control costs by 6 such actions as reorganizing itself into strategic business units. The implementation of high-speed rail service on the Northeast Corridor and the expansion of Amtraks express service business are the cornerstones of Amtraks plans to eliminate federal operating subsidies by the end of 2002. The Northeast Corridor high-speed rail program includes the electrification of the track between New Haven, Connecticut, and Boston, Massachusetts, and improvements to reduce trip times...
